The Wilds of Yucatan.

Correspondence of the Alexandria Gazette.] UXMAL, YUCATAN, March 1888 .- Since my last I have made a long journey by land and sea and am now in the interior of Yucatan, twenty one miles from a postoffice and twelve miles from the nearest neighbor. During the past two months I have seen much out of the regular line of travel, for much of the time I have been in the Indian trials where most of the journey had to be made on foot, and since I entered the country I have not slept in a bed, as hammocks are used among all classes here in place of beds. It is used as a chair, lounge, bed and ciothes line. The traveler fulfils the command of the scripture here to the letter, for he takes up his bed and walks. When night comes we only have to prepare our supper by the campfire, then swing our hammocks high up between two trees or from the branches, and then climb into them and swing ourselves to sleep, and that often as quickly as a baby would be rocked to sleep by the motion of its cradle. In it, though we be far from civilization and among the snakes, lizards, and the great aguana of the tropics, we are out of reach of all; besides, the big ants, bugs, spiders and other crawling things that would make sleeping on the ground or even in the open houses of the country very

I write this by the camp fire, and my hammock swings by my side and that of my Indian interpreter is close by it. He and I form the party. We have now been some weeks together. As a discription of my camping place may interest your readers I will give it. A large rubber tree towers above us; tall slender cactus is growing everywhere. The soil is very rocky and of coral formation, as is the whole of Vicetan. My table is rustic, indeed. of Yucatan. My table is rustic, indeed, being often the smooth side of a log; my wide hat brim is my desk, and a chunk of wood or a big rock my chair, a large tin cau close by is our coffee pot and gourds, wooden spoons and case-knife and fork the table furniture; sugar, coffee, cheese, chickens, sweet potatoes, corn cakes or torrillas, and pan cakes or French bread, form our bill of fare. Besides, we have plenty of fresh meat, as there are deer, wild hogs, wild cattle, pheasants and other game in abundance. All this is cooked barbacue style and we get enough ashes with it to make it wholesome, while broiling it over the hot coals. While I am deprived of many of the luxuries I enjoyed in Fairfax and Prince William counties, during my ramble Virginia, yet I see as I never saw before that solitude has its charms, and the beauties of the wilds around me, including strange birds, flowers, trees, fruits and the ever changing landscape I meet in the journey of a day, where a white man is rarely seen, to me far more than compensates the loss of all the pleasures and pastimes of fashionable society. From my hammock the cry of the wildcat and the tiger may be heard at night, yet to the lover of the wild woods it matters but little, while his hammock swings high and his powder is dry. Yet I would not have my readers, especial the distribution of the second process of the second process. ly the dissatisfied and adventurous boy, believe all is sunshine, for such is not the case, for to be an explorer is to take risks against man and beast and all the evils of a new climate. Your life will often depend on your own watchfulness and wakefulness. Should you succeed in making important discoveries, the plaudits of the public will be your reward; but you may fail and die of fever or famine in some foreign clime, in which case you will likely pass away unknelled, unknown, uncared for, and perhaps

The ruined and ancient city of Uxmal is, perhaps, the most extensive and remarkable tuin in the New World. The city was in ruins long before America was known to the Old World. Since I have been here I have entered about eighty large, well ventilated and lighted rooms. Their walls are white and smooth, and all is as perfect as if it had been approached to the contract of the contract o we builders' hands only a score of years

Yet on the floor I saw fresh tracks of ceived by left the builders' bands only a score of years wild beasts in the damp soil and the accumulated dust of centuries. Here, among fallen walls, tumbled down columns and broken statuary, the tiger and the wildcat and an unmolested home, and among the long, black gables the swallow builds her nest and the vampire bat finds its quiet hab. liation. As I loitered over the lone mounds and desecrated graves, which in the name of science have been made to give up their dead, and as I looked upon the gods before which generations have bowed, though they are lifeless pieces of stone, yet they impress ed me as I was never impressed before. Here, where I stand, and there, where the god was placed and worshiped, and before which lives were given up, blood and palpitating hearts were presented, yet all to a dead god. When we think of the modern Christian who were hims a living God we Christian who worships a living God, we are able to see the world's progress as we have never seen it before. In short, from desecrated and deserted unknown graves, from a mouldering city in the centre of a howling wilderness, with dead gods, to the well kept and flower covered-graves of my own land, with its populous cities, and, better than all, a worshiping people, who know and worship a God that liveth, was a source of pleasure to contemplate even in the wilderness.
